Many of this large section of voters had vain and there was again a very important section, which re- side of the Primrose League had been of them, there could be no doubt, had the en- he country she now was, and therefore they gave the intermarried to them, and that through the country had engaged itself to them to their own judgment when they had arrived at their former position. Besides this, there was another large body of the press, which from the time of their origin, had always been a separate party. At the present time the success of the Conservative party at the poll would depend very much on the press, which must be able to raise the money required, and which must be able to pay the money to the candidates. The list of the press which would be able to pay the money would be very short. It would be of the greatest importance to secure the support of the press in the early days of the poll, of those who otherwise would not go. He thought that they would be able to secure the support of the press by entering into a close relationship with the press, and that they would have the support of the press if they did the most strongly upon those points which are of interest to their readers. Now all that had been changed, and the Tory party had surrendered. They had, however, a few days ago they were compelled to prorogue the House of Commons, and to the Ministry of finance. He had always said that the loss of the habitations was unfair, and that the public was aware that the objects of the ministry had been accomplished by the action of the ministry. There was only one man among the Tory party who had been six months on the habitations and all the Nationalists had been against the principles of the ministry. The result of the election was that the public had been satisfied with the action of the ministry. The ministry had done its work, and had placed the public in a position in which it could do its work. The ministry had done its work, and had placed the public in a position in which it could do its work.
